

THE U.S. CHAMBER NEEDS TO GET ITS STORY STRAIGHT ON CLIMATE LEGISLATION.

It can be tough to understand where the U.S. Chamber stands on climate these days.

8/25/09 U.S. Chamber senior staff calls for a “Scopes Monkey Trial” to question whether global warming poses a human health threat.

9/29/09 The Chamber denies that “we deny the existence of any problem.” Says its critics are “dead wrong.”

10/26/09 U.S. Chamber President and CEO, Tom Donohue, says, “Is the science [of global warming] right? Is the science not right? I don’t know.”

11/03/09 The U.S. Chamber sends a letter to the Senate saying it “believes climate change is an important issue for this Congress to address” and commends “Senators Kerry and Graham for their recent [call for] comprehensive climate legislation.”

11/03/09 The U.S. Chamber later tweets that Congress should reject legislation with the “top-down approach of targets and timetables...”

11/06/09 The U.S. Chamber insists its 11/03/09 letter articulates the Chamber’s “position for the last two years and only represents a change to those who have willfully misrepresented it in the past.”

CONFUSED? SO ARE WE.

The U.S. Chamber of Commerce is using double-talk so they can have it both ways on climate policy.

No wonder they have lost their voice when it comes to climate change.

FIND OUT MORE AT

www.WhoDoesTheChamberRepresent.org